When a classroom is ethical, everyone in the classroom practices respect and well-being as the central motivation for getting educated. Respect and compassion towards classmates, as well as the teacher, are very important to maintain an ethical classroom. We should practice active listening so as to listen to our teachers as well as our peers. Ethical conduct is a two-way road and everyone should behave respectfully towards each other, be it the teacher or the student.

Students who are well behaved do better in school than those students who misbehave. Here are some things we should do so as to behave appropriately in the classroom. We should keep our eyes on the teacher, or on the blackboard. If we look randomly around the classroom, our teacher may feel that we aren't paying attention to the lesson. We should bring every material that we will need for class. If our teacher asks us to bring something specific to class, we should be sure to bring the item to class. We should also remain quiet during the class unless our teacher gives us permission to talk. If we wish to talk during class, we should raise our hand and wait for our teacher to respond. We should always shut off our mobile phones during class. A cell phone that's ringing can definitely disrupt a class. And lastly, we should show our teacher respect. We should always listen to our teacher when they are talking and follow all directions they give us.
